

The New Criterion

Poems

December 1999

Dialysis

by Floyd Skloot

In my brother's blind and dying eyes I was forever young.
He rocked and slept to the sound of my voice as long as memory played its tune. Then he woke to speak of vast silver platters heaped with meat and bouquets of cheese, hot loaves the way we found them on the island.
He said my breath had carried the dream along. We were back to back again in the Valiant's front seat, doors gaping and feet on the seething summer streets of Flatbush. As his eyes closed and sullied blood spun in loops of plastic tubing, I watched my brother closing down his life.
Time fell apart in his mind, leaving nowhere but the past for him to live. His will to sit through this ritual cleansing weakened as each day blended until only sleep remained.

Floyd Skloot isBio

more from this author

This article originally appeared in The New Criterion, Volume 18 December 1999, on page 35

Copyright © 2012 The New Criterion | www.newcriterion.com

<http://www.newcriterion.com/articles.cfm/Dialysis-2762>