

The New Criterion

Features

April 1997

Edwin Muir's journey

by Robert Richman

On the Scottish poet & his work

In his Autobiography (1954), the Scottish poet Edwin Muir expressed bitterness at the late start he got on poetry. "I was thirty-five ... and passing through a stage which, if things had been different, I should have reached ten years earlier. I began to write poetry at thirty-five instead of at twenty-five or twenty." In fact, his First Poems was published in 1925, when Muir was thirty-eight. It had been preceded by a ten-year spell of odd jobs, unsettled opinions (Nietzsche, socialism), and unhappy love affairs. He had already produced a volume of aphoristic essays, We Moderns (1918), which show Muir under the spell of Nietzsche and which he later disowned. In 1922, on a visit to Dresden with his wife, Muir had a kind of revelation: "I must live over again the years which I had lived wrongly ... everyone should live his life twice, for the first attempt is always blind." The theme of repet ...

Robert Richman's book of poems, Voice on the Wind, was recently published by Copper Beech Press.

more from this author

This article originally appeared in The New Criterion, Volume 15 April 1997, on page 26

Copyright © 2012 The New Criterion | www.newcriterion.com

<http://www.newcriterion.com/articles.cfm/Edwin-Muir-s-journey-3349>