

The New Criterion

Poems

September 2008

Terminal

by John Foy

What if, past a certain point, it weren't so bad to die? What if it were like lying on a couch at 3:00 a.m., the mind aloft and quiet, given over to a few piano notes finding ways melodically through predetermined loops in Brian Eno's Music for Airports?
That's what you'd be listening to, music for those places where we go to go away, the music of going away, and you just disappearing into it without effort or pain, finding peace in knowing to obey means at its root only to listen.

John Foy

more from this author

This article originally appeared in The New Criterion, Volume 27 September 2008, on page 31

Copyright © 2009 The New Criterion | www.newcriterion.com

<http://www.newcriterion.com/articles.cfm/Terminal-3888>