

The New Criterion

The Media

January 2009

The mystification of change

by James Bowman

On the media's game of good and evil.

As an example of media obtuseness, the emphatic adversatives in the New York Times's headline to Fox Butterfield's classic story of 1997—"Crime Rates are Falling, but Prisons Keep on Filling: More Inmates, Despite Slight Drop in Crime"—take some beating. The Times itself tried to top it six years later with a variation on the same theme as Mr. Butterfield resumed his sleuthing to probe the mystery of the "researchers" who had made the "surprising" discovery of a 2.6 percent annual increase in the prison population while, at the same time, "serious crime had fallen."

Since then, those same clueless researchers must have turned their attention to foreign attitudes towards America, as they have produced a new contender for Mr. Butterfield's crown—also, naturally enough, from one of his colleagues at the newspaper of record. On the first ...

James Bowman is the author of Honor: A History (Encounter Books) and Media Madness: The Corruption of Our Political Culture, also published by Encounter (2008) .

more from this author

This article originally appeared in The New Criterion, Volume 27 January 2009, on page 57

Copyright © 2012 The New Criterion | www.newcriterion.com

<http://www.newcriterion.com/articles.cfm/The-mystification-of-change-3976>