

The New Criterion

Features

February 2007

The English-speaking century

by Keith Windschuttle

On Andrew Roberts' History of the English-Speaking Peoples Since 1900.

In the past one hundred years, four successive political movements—Prussian militarism, German Nazism, Japanese imperialism, and international Communism—mounted military campaigns to conquer Europe, Asia, and the world. Had any of them prevailed, it would have been a profound loss for civilization as we know it. Yet over the course of these bids for power, a coalition headed first by Britain and then by the United States emerged not just to oppose but to destroy them utterly.

From the long perspective of human affairs, these victories must stand as among the most remarkable of the past three millennia. They were as decisive for world history as the victories of the ancient Greeks over Persia, of Rome over Carthage, and of the Franks over the Umayyad Caliphate.

Moreover, military triumph has been complemented by economic success. The policies of free-trade liberalism, which in the nineteenth ...

Keith Windschuttle is an author and publisher who is a frequent contributor to The New Criterion and Quadrant.

more from this author

This article originally appeared in The New Criterion, Volume 25 February 2007, on page 4

Copyright © 2008 The New Criterion | www.newcriterion.com

<http://www.newcriterion.com/articles.cfm/the-english-speaking-century-2579>